ADMISSIONS

Given the broad nature of the program, there are no strict prerequisites for admission. Interested applicants should identify and contact potential faculty advisors. Admission to the graduate program is contingent upon being accepted by an individual faculty advisor. Applicants should contact potential faculty advisors by email early in the application process to discuss mutual interests and to determine if the faculty member is actively recruiting graduate students. For a list of all faculty members and their research interests, please see Faculty (<https://fms.wisc.edu/faculty-staff/>) on the program website.

In addition to the Graduate School application, all applicants must electronically submit at least three letters of recommendation, the supplemental application questions, a personal statement including areas of research interest and the names of prospective faculty advisors, a CV/resume, and unofficial transcripts from all undergraduate and graduate schools attended (official transcripts will be requested if recommended for admission to the program). Most admission decisions will be made, and applicants will be notified, by the end of March.
